

difficult, but perhaps a two-year authorization might be easier where we kind of do a lot of the policy reforms while putting off the fight over higher or lower investment. I think also the infrastructure bank is an idea that I still think needs to really be pushed. I know President Obama had proposed it in the 2008 campaign and again this past fall, but I think it's something that has the potential to be somewhat game-changing if done right, and if made actually independent, and if it's actually allowed to issue it's own debt. I think that it could be a major game changer.
